

Congress of the United States
Washington, DC 20510

Director Russel Vought
Office of Management and Budget
1650 Pennsylvania Avenue NW
Washington, DC 20502

Dear Director Vought:

We write today on behalf of American consumers to express outrage that the Administration's draft budget reportedly includes plans to eliminate the bipartisan, independent Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC) and absorb some of its functions and staff into a currently nonexistent staff division within the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS). The CPSC develops and enforces commonsense product safety standards, facilitates recalls of unsafe products, and educates consumers and businesses on product hazards and best practices. Eliminating the agency will put the physical safety of all Americans at risk.

Congress created the CPSC almost 50 years ago to protect Americans from unreasonable risks of injury or death associated with consumer products. The Administration does not have the authority to eliminate a Commission established by Congress, as doing so would exceed its constitutional powers and undermine the principles of the legislative process.

The establishment of the CPSC as an independent five-member commission reflected the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee's understanding that product safety should be "as far removed as possible from partisan influence."¹ Since its inception, the CPSC has played a vital role safeguarding American families, and in particular infants, children, and older Americans. Thanks to the CPSC's critical work, residential fires and fire-related deaths have decreased by over 40 percent.² Crib deaths and child poisonings have dropped by 80 percent.³ The Commission's work continues today, identifying emerging threats and protecting Americans from dangerous and banned imported products. With the rapid growth of e-commerce and imported consumer products, especially from countries with less stringent safety regulations, CPSC plays a critical role to prevent unsafe and counterfeit goods from entering the U.S. market unchecked. These protections for American families have led to a comprehensive set of product safety standards, recall processes, data collection, and public education, which cannot be transferred to a new agency by executive action.

HHS lacks the statutory authority to carry out the CPSC's critical functions. Moreover, HHS already carries a broad mandate, overseeing food and drug regulation, communicable disease prevention, public health emergency preparation and responses, medical research, and the administration of Medicare, Medicaid, and the Children's Health Insurance Program. Yet, your Administration's proposed budget plans would reduce HHS's discretionary budget by one-third and eliminate 20,000 staff positions. Adding product safety to HHS's already vast and demanding mandate, all while slashing the department's budget and staff, would jeopardize the lives and physical safety of American families.

We strongly oppose any attempt to eliminate, defund, or weaken the CPSC and demand that you immediately roll back any efforts to dissolve the agency. Americans rightfully expect that the products they bring into their home are safe, and only the CPSC has the authority and expertise to ensure that expectation is met. The CPSC's continued existence is essential to protecting Americans from preventable injury and death. Without the dedicated oversight of the CPSC, American families, especially children, will be left vulnerable in their own homes.

Sincerely,

Richard Blumenthal
